

Patricia Peterson, a professor at UofSC, had to attend a research conference about how to teach students better about calculus. Nobody wore masks at the conference. Patricia then got CO-VID 19.

Storyboard by
Jason Tran

Patricia then got really sick. She had a bad fever and lost her sense of taste. She also had to quarantine herself in her apartment

Patricia then got really hungry and didn't know what to do. She then looked on the app store on her iPhone, saw Quarantine Dash, and downloaded it. She ordered her peanut free hamburger using the peanut allergy filter, and she got free fries using dash points that she received when she signed up.

shutterstock.com - 1538798007

The delivery man was very quick and followed all safety precautions. Her PEANUT-FREE burger and FREE fries were still hot when delivered.

She then enjoyed her delicious PEANUT-FREE burger, and FREE fries and became no longer hungry.

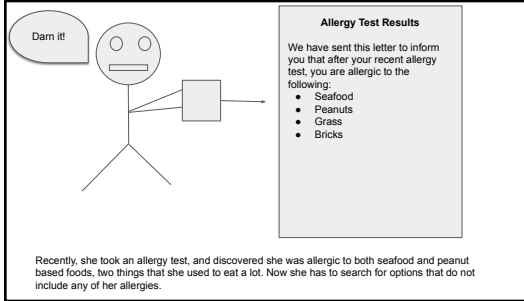

Since Patricia enjoyed her experience on Quarantine Dash, she continued to use Quarantine Dash and her Dash points until she was CO-VID free. Legends and myths say that Patricia is now healthy, once again teaching her students about calculus, and using Quarantine Dash every day.

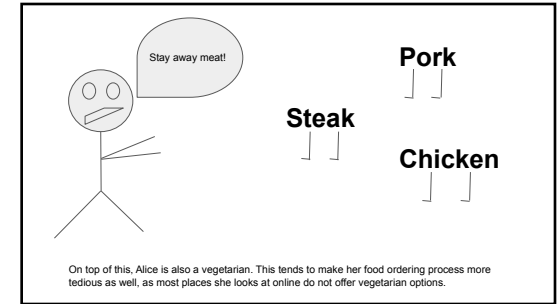

Storyboard by
Matthew Riddick

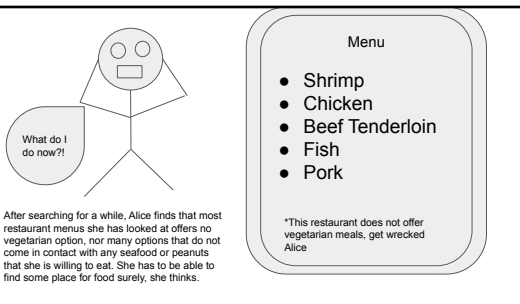

Because of COVID, Alice spends most of her time in her apartment so she can avoid the risk of potentially getting it. Most days she will order food online and get it delivered to her so that she does not have to go out and get it. Today is one of those days.

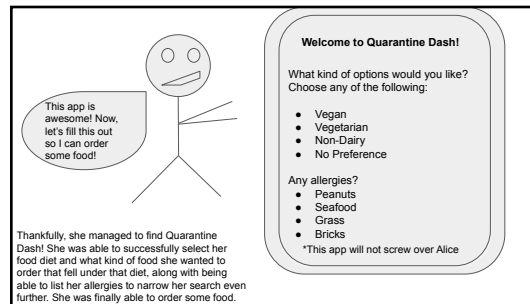

Recently, she took an allergy test, and discovered she was allergic to both seafood and peanut based foods, two things that she used to eat a lot. Now she has to search for options that do not include any of her allergies.

On top of this, Alice is also a vegetarian. This tends to make her food ordering process more tedious as well, as most places she looks at online do not offer vegetarian options.

After searching for a while, Alice finds that most restaurant menus she has looked at offers no vegetarian option, nor many options that do not come in contact with any seafood or peanuts that she is willing to eat. She has to be able to find some place for food surely, she thinks.

Thankfully, she managed to find Quarantine Dash! She was able to successfully select her food diet and what kind of food she wanted to order that fell under that diet, along with being able to list her allergies to narrow her search even further. She was finally able to order some food.

She ordered her food and a someone showed up to her apartment in no time! The delivery person even showed up to her apartment with their mask on to deliver the food. Thanks to "Quarantine Dash!", Alice was able to get her food in the comfort of her own home and exactly how she wanted. How convenient!

